MORE BOY CRAZIES

You'd be surprised at how many boys write in to this column and complain that they're being neglected. All right, boys, you asked for it. Don't say we didn't warn you.

How's your Lost Life?—It's catalysmic if you're wearing one of those Don O'Connor leather jackets and you probably are! How do you feel about the way the gals have taken them right off your many shoulders?

Stick Shorts, of course, you're still blinding us with those violent "[illegible]" but it's your new Glen plaids that make your Able Grable sing, "My Beloved Is Rugged."

In the Know About Beaus—They tell us that you're wearing your Sinatra bowties on your belt buckles. Say it isn't so!

Up Your Sleeves—Lots of boys are wearing those leather dog collars as bracelets. As many as five on a wrist, all in different colors! It's brutal.

Sweater Favorite—It's an up and coming sweater style with the wolves—this button front, sleeveless job. Watch out, boys, the gals will steal it from you, just as they've made away with your argyles and reindeers, your V necks and your sleeveless pull-ons.

ENGLISH IS BROKEN HERE

It's a new kind of double talk that has us in a tizzy. Mebbe it's the influence of that popular movie, "Janie," or mebbe it's all your own idea. You certainly have the outsiders in the well-known state of utter confusion.

Scrambled Letters—If someone says "Ond Geeevning" to you, don't report him to the FBI. He's simply saying "Good Evening" in the new scrambled way that puts the first letter of a word between the first and second syllables. See?

Shakespearian Shake-up — When you hear a teen-ager voice sayint, "Hasten, varlet, with that double malted," or "Yea, verily, it sends me," it isn't something out of the old Bard of Avon. It's just one of those new Trends we're always talking about.

In Reverse—Have you heard about the Frog who couldn't croak because he had a Man in his throat? Have you heard about the People Toed Pigeons? Have you heard about the sick dog who said, "It shouldn't happen to a man"? These gags in reverse are good for a giggle any time.

Well, send me and cull me Swoony if that isn't the end of our Jabberwocky lesson for today!

Rural Telephones May Get Federal Loans

Bill Would Provide For Private Expansion

By WALTER SHEAD
WNU Washington Correspondent

WASHINGTON D. C.—The Party Line, being the butt of jibes and ridicule, may be on its way out if a bill intended to "provide or improve telephone service in rural areas" becomes law under the new 79th congress.

Considerable interest has been aroused in the measure introduced by Senator Lister Hill (D., Ala.) which would provide for a special fund of 100 million dollars and create a federal agency to be known as the "Rural Telephone administration."

This administration would administer the law and the fund with authority to make loans to telephone companies, or to individuals, corporations, states, municipalities, utility districts, or to non-profit cooperative associations, also to the Rural Electrification administration for the purpose of financing the construction, rehabilitation, modernization and operation of telephone systems, exchange lines, or other facilities for furnishing telephone service to persons in rural areas who are not receiving adequate service. The measure also provides for improvement or betterment of existing service to persons in these areas.

Senator Hill, as a result of considerable study on the rural telephone problem asserted that in 1920 almost 2½ million farm homes had telephones and that by 1940 this number had decreased to about 1¾ million, a decrease of about 40 per cent. Rates for farm telephone service have increased from about $1.39 to an average of $1.80 at the present time. He also pointed out that 75 per cent of the nation's farms numbering 4,166,000 still do not have telephone service.

Some 30,000 smaller telephone companies in the nation would be the chief beneficiaries under the bill as borrowers from the fund to modernize their plants, rebuild existing lines and construct new ones. Loans would be made on a self-liquidating basis at an interest rate of 1½ per cent with 35 years in which to repay the principal.

Cardui is a liquid medicine which many women say has brought relief from the cramp-like agony and nervous strain of functional periodic distress. Here's how it may help:
1 Takes like a tonic. It should stimulate appetite, aid digestion,* thus help build resistance for the "times" to come.

RURAL MEDICAL CARE

SITUATION SERIOUS

Blacksburg, Feb. 21.- Rural people are finding it harder and harder to get doctors when they need them and hospitals are out of the question for many farmers in Virginia.

That's the story of the present medical care situation in the Old Dominion... one that is now receiving the attention of many agencies and organizations in the hope that legislation and other action can be taken to help improve rural health conditions.

A shortage o doctors available for country call. is one problem. It's a problem which existed before the war and is only worse today because more doctors are at war, for one thing. Another cause is that young doctors have had longer and more expensive educations in recent years. Modern medicine calls for more equipment than the country doctor of the old days ever dreamed of. Unless they are located where they can rely on scientific equipment, today's doctors are frequently handicapped.

Thus they prefer to practice in towns and cities. Their incomes in the city, of course, are larger. In order to get doctors, rural people have to call upon those in towns [illegible] survey shows that the Virginia farmer pays an average of $60 a year for medical care. One farmer in six has bills of more than $100.

Doctors say that much of our sickness and many of our deaths could be prevented if people got better medical care. About half our population loses two or more weeks every year because of illness, and farm people are no exception.

An adequate system of medical care would cost large sums, but would save more than it cost. That is something for Virginians to think about.

UNITY

"The unity of government, which constitutes you one people, is also now dear to you. It is justly so; for it is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independence; the support of your tranquility at home; your peace abroad; of your safety; of your prosperity in every shape; of that very liberty which you so highly prize."

—GEORGE WASHINGTON

In the midst of global war, America in gratitude reveres "The Father of His Country", and remembers that his unceasing battle for unity among his people laid the cornerstone of a mighty nation.

The dream of a unified America sustained George Washington and his ragged army through the terrible winters of the Revolution. But his battle for unity did not end when the guns ceased firing at Yorktown.

At Philadelphia in 1787, when delegates of the Colonies met to discuss and draw up a constitution, it was Washington's determination and his steadying hand — amidst disagreements and disunity — that helped to smooth ruffled feelings and weld the sentiment of the colonists, who adopted the Constitution of the United States — the integrating shield of unity.

Unity in its written form was not all that Washington sought; he strove for unity in the lives of men, in their daily tasks, in their patriotic endeavors.

But, Washington foresaw the possibility of a return of disunity with its destructive effect upon the nation he loved. The warning in his Farewell Address resounds like a clarion-call:

"Unity . . . is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independence . . . of that very liberty, which you so highly prize."

Today, the mighty America that Washington knew only in his dreams, yet labored for and suffered for, must be on constant guard against disunity.

And to the extent that we remember the common sense lesson that Washington taught us, depends the measure of our final victory in this war.
